Introduction

Many South Asian women came to Britain in the 1960s and 1970s to join their husbands who were already settled and working. In Britain, the 1960s saw an increase in the number of women being accepted into higher education and finding employment. However, there were still attitudes and practices that meant women were treated differently because of their gender, for example as soon as they married or were pregnant they were sacked or required to leave their jobs. Within the South Asian communities attitudes were also changing. While some cultural traditions meant that women were not allowed to work outside of the home, many women had to take up employment in order to supplement the family income and make ends meet.
Starter:

Take a look at the photo of an Indian woman holding a placard (edited). What do you think it says? Discuss your suggestions. (5 mins)

Now take a look at the unedited photo. What new questions arise? How does it change your initial ideas and suggestions?

Task 1

Read source 1
Excerpt from an oral history interview conducted with Najma Mirza. Najma was born in Kanpur, India in 1947 and arrived in London in 1967.

"I worked for the United Dairy, because I did a degree in science. So I got the job with the United Dairies and they had a laboratory ...so I worked there for 5 years. I was quite happy there... And that was my first job; I never had to work before in Pakistan."
What questions can you think of after reading the above statement? Choose 5 questions and write down what the answers could be.

Task 3

Imagine you are a migrant from the sources above. A union has asked you about the changes you want to see. Design a placard for a protest?

The strike at Grunwick began with a small number of Asian workers walking out 'in protest at oppressive working conditions' on 20 August 1976.

Teacher’s notes

These educational resources are intended to be used in the study of the changing roles and status of women in Britain through the lens of South Asian female women who migrated to the UK in the 1960s and 1970s. Students are given the opportunity to interact with a variety of sources. The use of photographs and documents in the lesson plan shows how information can be gathered from non-oral history sources and can be used alongside oral history testimonies to provide a fuller picture. (E.g. the address and telephone number of JamilaQureshi’s company which was not mentioned in the oral history interview).

While many Asian women from Pakistan, India, Bangladesh and East Africa worked in textile and manufacturing factories, there were also those who came to England with not only undergraduate degrees but also Masters degrees. This counters the assumption that many took up menial jobs because of their lack of education. Rather it was a number of factors. Cultural attitudes meant that some women were expected to remain at home and look after the house and families and therefore were only able to supplement the income by taking in piecemeal work. Some women had not worked prior to coming to England because of their social standing – they had not needed to. Their arrival in England often signalled a shift in that to keep up with the cost of day-to-day living they had to work to supplement the household income.
